Celery plants when set in the beds process begins. There are several methods in vogue for this, namely, by blanchwhere the soil is very rich indeed and irrigation is practicable, as in some garus, celery plants are grown so close together that all light is excluded, and they blanch themselves, this system being known as the "new celery culture." The latter method has often proved impracticable, however, and as the "earthing up" way is the simplest, we describe it here. The earth about the plant is drawn up closely around it with a hor, and then more soil is pressed against it with the hands, which keeps the enlery leaves in an upright position with no chance of spreading, and only the tops of the leaves showing. After this, the earth between the rows is day empelier; leave Pavilien 8:20, via East and banked up to the top of each plant
